A long wooden frieze, partially preserved, recovered from the mosque of Sudun min Zadeh (803-04 AH / 1401 CE). The fragment comprises three complete panels, with designs arranged on a grid of bisected diamonds, each containing carved rectangles and hexagonal cartouches punctuated by triangles at their midpoints, filled with small scrolls, leaves, trefoils, and buds. Large holes along its length indicate how it was once affixed to supporting structures. Removed in the late nineteenth century after the site fell into ruin, the frieze preserves a valuable fragment of the mosque's original ornamentation.
