Balustrade

From Manzil Sitt ʻAisha al-Bayda

W: 127 cm; H: 40 cm

Inv. no. 505

Originally part of a presumably longer balustrade, these lathe-turned elements were later mounted into a modern frame, perhaps to evoke their original configuration. In their initial arrangement, the square pieces would have been aligned and connected along the horizontal axis by an additional series of small lathe-turned elements; the drilled holes that once secured these connectors remain visible. In the current assembly, the fleurons are positioned inconsistently - facing upward or downward - whereas the original layout likely followed a more deliberate order, either alternating in sequence or uniformly oriented, probably with all fleurons facing upward.
