This atypical, patchwork-like panel is structured around a repeating field of elongated hexagons which likely once formed part of a kirindazi composition incorporating triangles. The upper and lower fields, by contrast, introduce more irregular and at times asymmetrical groupings of polygons, disrupting the visual continuity of the design. These inconsistencies, together with the awkward relationship between the joinery pieces and their surrounding frame, strongly suggest that the panel was reassembled from an earlier object. On the basis of the design and the relatively good condition of the surviving pieces, the reused elements may be tentatively dated to the late Mamluk or early Ottoman periods.
